How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

The Westwood Quality SmallCap Fund underperformed its representative benchmark, the Russell 2000® Value Index, in the reporting period. Equity markets experienced increased volatility from geopolitical risks and equity-market shocks, while earnings strength among artificial intelligence (AI)-linked mega-cap technology firms remained a key area of support for equities, especially in the U.S. market. An increase in market breadth that began in late 2025 continued throughout early 2026, as value stocks, small caps and non-U.S. equities experienced periodic leadership as investors sought broader participation and downside resilience.

On a relative basis, the top sectors were Financials and Industrials, with stock selection as the primary driver of outperformance for each sector. The Technology and Communications sectors were the worst relative performers for the period, with underperformance in each sector primarily driven by stock selection and mitigated by the interaction between selection and allocation decisions.

The top contributor to performance was Veeco Instruments, Inc. (VECO), which advanced due to rapid order growth and backlog expansion and accelerating AI-driven demand in photonics, packaging and optics. Shares of Everus Construction Group, Inc. (ECG) gained after record financial performance and a strategic acquisition of SE&M Constructors.

MYR Group, Inc. (MYRG) rose during the period due to significant margin expansion and massive demand tailwinds from grid modernization and data centers.

BlackLine, Inc. (BL) was the largest detractor from performance for the period, retreating due to margin compression, weak guidance and slowing revenue growth. Shares of Verra Mobility Corporation (VRRM) also fell due to margin compression, in addition to declining free cash flow and rising capital intensity.

Merit Medical Systems, Inc. (MMSI) rounded out the largest detractors, declining due to tariff-driven margin pressure and an earnings miss late in the period.
