How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

The Westwood Quality Value Fund underperformed its representative benchmark, the Russell 1000® Value Index, in the reporting period. Equity markets experienced increased volatility from geopolitical risks and equity-market shocks, while earnings strength among artificial intelligence (AI)-linked mega-cap technology firms remained a key area of support for equities, especially in the U.S. market. An increase in market breadth that began in late 2025 continued throughout early 2026, as value stocks, small caps and non-U.S. equities experienced periodic leadership as investors sought broader participation and downside resilience.

The top-performing sectors on a relative basis were Utilities and Health Care, driven by strong selection and an underweight allocation relative to the benchmark, respectively. Technology and Financials were the worst performers on a relative basis, primarily due to stock selection in each sector. Texas Instruments, Inc. (TXN) was the top contributor to performance for the trailing period, benefiting from AI/data center demand, industrial segment recovery and strong forward guidance above expectations. Shares of Qnity Electronics, Inc. (Q) gained as the company completed its spin-off into a standalone company positioned as a pure-play semiconductor materials and solutions provider.

Alphabet, Inc. - Class A (GOOGL) advanced after reporting AI product breakthroughs relating to the company's cross-product implementation of its Gemini platform and announcing a strategic partnership to power Apple's AI features with Gemini.

Salesforce, Inc. (CRM) was the largest detractor from performance for the period, falling after guidance disappointments and workforce reductions tied to restructuring and execution risk. Shares of LPL Financial Holdings, Inc. (LPLA) declined due to mixed earnings, AI-driven disruption concerns and regulatory penalties.

Microsoft Corporation (MSFT) fell due to workforce reductions tied to restructuring, in addition to concerns about AI capital spending.
